"Tom is worked pretty hard lately, isn't he?" said Mrs. Blackford in reply to her daughter, who had just opened the envelope a messenger boy had delivered.

"Yes, and it seems strange, for he was never as busy on overtime during this season of the year before."

She was looking listlessly through the window upon the passing show of Amsterdam avenue—its rushing trolley cars, its perpetual procession of pedestrians and vehicles.

He had reached Eighth avenue, and was about to cross that brightly illuminated, thickly thronged thoroughfare, but ere he could step from the curb a heavy hand was laid on his shoulder.

He awoke from his day dreams of Grace, and the pretty vision of his sweetheart faded as he found his passage barred by two stalwart, stern-looking men.

"Then't think it's quite right, Grace," replied life, Blackford, "for you to go to the theatre with Fred Early, especially on tickets that Tom has sent you."

"Oh, nonserse, mother. Don't I tell you that Fred will pay for himself, and life, Blackford life, and life, and life, Blackford life, and life, heart faded as he found his passage barred by two stalwart, stern-looking men.

"You had better come with us, James Hartwell," one of them said. "We've been looking for you for some time. That workingman's dress is a very neat disguise, but it don't go worth a cent this time."

Tom was dumfounded. "Who—who are you?" he stammered.

"Oh, come now, you needn't ask who we are," was the reply, "but since you're anxious to know, just come along with us to Mulberry street and we'll give you full particulars."

And before Tom Britton could half realize what had happened he was being hurried off to Police Headquarters by the two Central Office detectives.

Esat Fourteenth street, between Third and Fourth avenues, was crowded as usual with the idle loiterers who frequent it nightly.

Electric lights shone upon the gay paraders passing to and fro along the southern sidewalk, while the northern one lay comparatively deserted and in shadow.

one lay comparatively deserted and in shadow.

Grace Blackford and Nettle Early were walking quickly from the Academy of Music toward Union Square.

They were alone, for Fred Early had only promised to call for them when the play would be over, and they had not waited for the end, Something—she hardly knew what-lay upon Grace's spirits like a pall, utterly depressing her.

'All the mischlevous, coquettish spirit in which she had started out that evening had vanished, and in its stead had come a yearning desire for home and a sense of contrition for her unkind impulses toward her sweetheart Tom.

Buddenly she felt conscious that some one was following her, and almost involuntarily she tyrned around with a nervous start.

The man who had been in the theatre box—Tom Britton's double—was close behind her.
